This is the favorite position of no wall or tree to lean his back against and to steady him. I have passed them out in the country, when camped for dinner, sitting around on their haunches like so many jack-rabbits just on the point of jumping up and scampering away. During the day the colchons, or mattresses, are folded and laid in a corner, and the blankets and other bedding nearly arranged upon them. A few cooking-utensils complete the stock of

Sometimes the placita is used as a corral for the burros and goats, Dr. Tutt: and then it is not so pleasant.

MANSIONS OF THE UPPER TEN.

The houses of the wealthy Mexicans are very spacious and comfortable. I have occupied a room in one of them during my stay in Santa Fé-the hotels not being attractive-and a brief description of it may give the reader an idea of how the aristocratic dons used to live. The house is on the corner of two wide streets, a long block from the plaza, is square, and is about 150 feet long on each side. It is built of adobe, walls being about two and one half or three feet thick and nine or ten feet high. The roof is flat, and a veranda five or six feet wide, projecting from it and supported by posts, protects the bouse from the sun on three sides. The placifa, or court-yard, is 75 or 100 feet square, and a portice sur-rounds it, shading the inner walls of the house. An arched gateway with doors, which can be closed at night, extends from the street through the centre of the house in front to the placita. The walls, both inside and out, are neatly whitewashed, and everything about the place is scrupulously neat. On each side of the main entrance, between the street and the placity, a door leads into a suit of and the placita, a door leads into a suit of the front ones having windows opening on the street and the back ones upon the placita, the rooms themselves be ing respectively about twenty and fifteen A SKETCH OF SANTA FE-ADOBE ARCHITEC. feet square.
